Russian road to victory easy in Georgia

By STEFAN KORSHAK

GORI, GEORGIA – The debris of a defeated Georgian army, and quite possibly hopes of a solid NATO ally in the Caucasus, litters the road to Gori. And it just wasn't supposed to be that way.

A drive up that surprisingly well-maintained roadway between the national capital of Tbilisi and the provincial seat where Soviet dictator Josef Stalin was born was, on the last day of the South Ossetia war, a surreal excursion. The same goes for the logic that seemingly drove Georgia into a full-fledged war against its giant neighbor Russia, a conflict that supposedly ended with a ceasefire agreement on Aug. 12. However, even after the truce was announced, news services were reporting Russian military incursions near Tbilisi.

The geopolitical idea, for the Georgian government and its foreign friends, was that the former Soviet republic of Georgia would build a high-quality professional military along NATO lines, and trained by U.S. trainers to U.S. standards.

But Georgians abandoned Gori, a city of 37,000 residents, hastily and without a fight, as looming Russian tank columns rumbled from South

Russian troops ride atop armored vehicles and trucks in Georgia's breakaway province of Abkhazia (above), while a Georgian woman (right) cries near the city of Gori, just outside the breakaway province of South Ossetia, after she learns her child was killed in the conflict that may have claimed 2,000 lives since Aug. 7. Georgia accused Russia of violating an Aug. 12 ceasefire by sending troops from South Ossetia deep into Georgia proper, but Russia denied any incursions. Each side accused the other of atrocities. Ossetia. The retreat, and at some points outright panic, showed the weaknesses of that optimistic plan. And on Aug. 12, dozens of abandoned Georgian military vehicles littered the road back to Tbilisi.

The Georgian army had of course for the previous four days been firing rocket barrages, and shoving troops north, in an attempt to push into the renegade province of South Ossetia and capture its capital, Tskhinvali.

The Georgian plan was to overwhelm the region with a concentration of U.S.-schooled infantry backed up by bombardments delivered by NATO-standard Czech-manufactured heavy artillery.

Five of those hulking, self-propelled and expensive howitzers on wheels, out of 24 bought from Prague and paid for by destitute Georgia's tiny military budget, stood abandoned on the road to Gori. Hatches were open, passersby could inspect the fire control equipment inside and help themselves to military clothing and rations. One crew quit its vehicle in such a hurry that the anti-aircraft machine gun was still mounted and free for the taking.

Got valuables? Carry them on plane when traveling at Boryspil

By YULIYA POPOVA

popova@kpmmedia.ua

Travelers call them airport vultures. Police dub them luggage thieves. But whatever their name, they work at Boryspil International Airport checking out your bags after you check them in.

"Every third bag was pilfered, every single flight was checked, and only one percent of these incidents were investigated," prosecutor Eduard Shevchenko said in describing the massive scope of fraud in the nation's largest international airport.

Major air carriers in Ukraine reported more than 11,000 thefts in 2007. Police, however, registered just 578 incidents for the same period of time. They opened criminal proceedings only in nine cases. After an investigation exposed the staggering difference in reported thefts between the airlines and police, the General Prosecutor's Office last month busted a police squad and six luggage handlers.

"I was waiting 45 minutes for my suitcase," said Kateryna Koval, a victim of baggage looting after arriving in Ukraine from a recent trip to Istanbul. "What do you think they were doing all this time? They were pulling things out and now an airport handler somewhere is one camera richer!"

Celebrities, prominent businessmen, ambassadors and even students—all have fallen prey to luggage thieves. Passengers reported cameras, jewelry, laptops and other valuables missing from their checked-in cargo after crossing a Ukrainian border.

Prosecutor Shevchenko said that police and airport security workers responsible for escorting passengers' bags from the airport to an airplane "were practically ignoring their duties."

In summer, with herds of holiday makers rushing to get away, bag-lifting spoils many a holiday.

"EVERY THIRD BAG WAS PILFERED, EVERY SINGLE FLIGHT WAS CHECKED."

— Prosecutor Eduard Shevchenko

"A luggage mafia exists, it's a fact. Chaining middle management and lower level personnel, it works on the principles of kinship and joint responsibility," claims investigative journalist Artem Shevchenko.

His TV program "Undercover Agents," echoing British "Dispatches" and America's "60 Minutes," went behind the scenes in Boryspil in winter 2008 to trace stolen cameras and laptops. "Undercover Agents" is broadcast Mondays at 10:30 p.m. on Inter TV channel. Shevchenko discovered that the first serious probe into the "growing trend" was ordered by a parliamentarian whose wife's jewelry was stolen on a flight from Los Angeles.

The deputy, Igor Shkiryia of the Party of Regions, served on the transport committee at the time. He joined forces with aviation officials to investigate luggage fraud and his wife's missing $14,000 rings and earrings.

This commission found out that a passenger with a valuable load goes through a chain of well-trained personnel who have their own Morse code for bag-lifting. The weakest link in this route is the luggage section on a plane. Without security cameras, handlers find themselves alone with travelers' luggage and their valuables.

"We learned there's a black market for stolen goods and even catalogue orders of what's needed," the journalist said, referring to the scale of fraud.

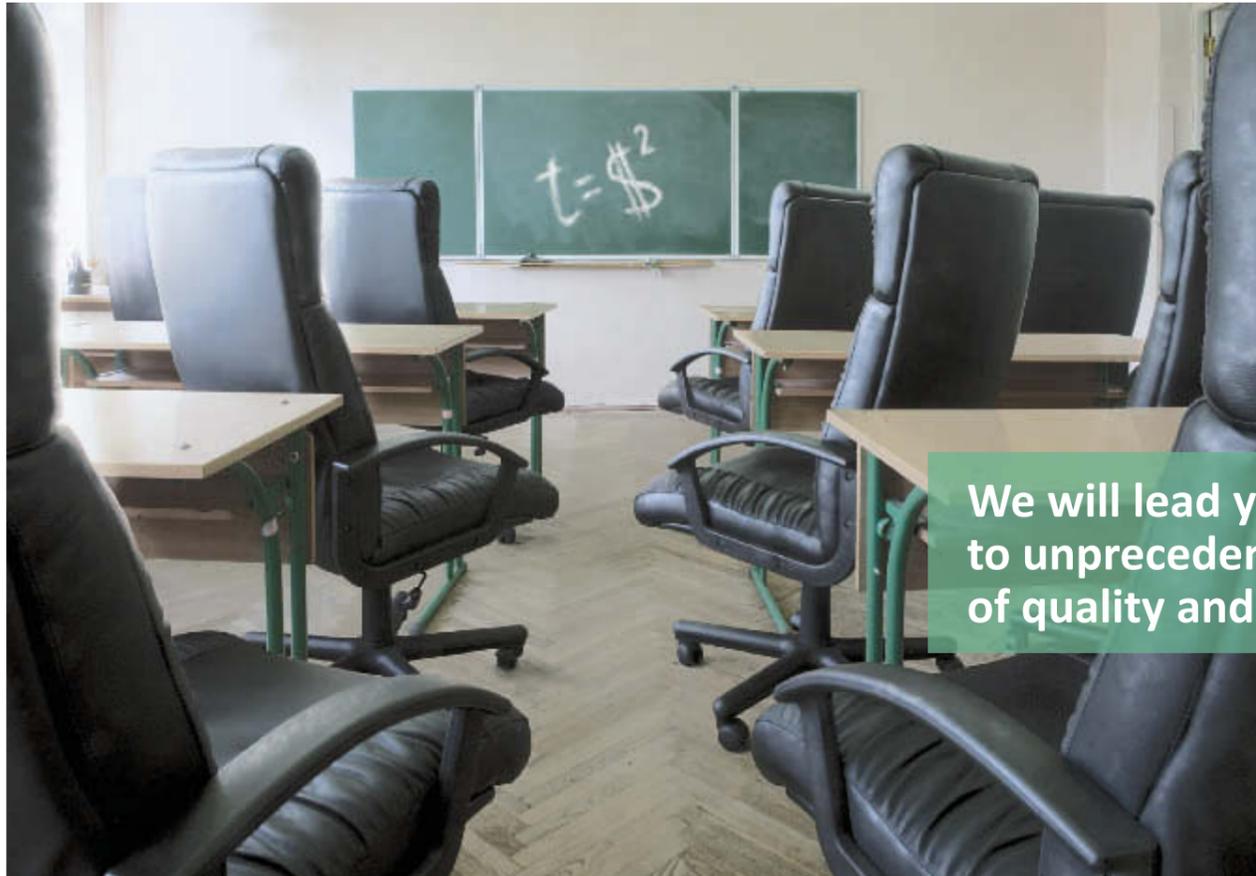

Prosecutors deny that there is an organized chain, so do Boryspil officials. "Luggage looting is one of the main problems airports face all over the world," airport officials explain on their website's front page. A special department for air security has been set up to tighten control. Twenty luggage handlers "who could not be trusted" have been fired over the last few years, according to the website.

Russians quickly overpower Georgians

Georgian President Mikheil Saakashvili's calculation, now clearly faulty and the direct cause of the abandoned Czech artillery pieces, was that the Georgian army could swoop into the province and grab it before his opponents, and particularly the Russians, could react.

It might have worked too, but for a detachment of 588 Russian infantrymen stationed in South Ossetia as peacekeepers. Given Moscow's long-time support of South Ossetia, they were also dug in and ready to fight hard if the Georgians ever came.

The Russians held, and that bought time for Colonel General Anatoliy Nogovitsyn, the gravel-voiced deputy head of Russia's General Staff and Saakashvili's opponent in the South Ossetia war, to launch a counter-offensive, first by air, then with tanks.

Russia lost between four and 14 jets in the war, depending on whose army was doing the counting, but in any case by the third day the Russian air force was ranging freely all over Georgia.

A common remark by Georgians moving along the road to and from Gori during the war, and discussing the Russian air force, was that the Russians "could see everything with their satellites," and "can decide exactly what they hit."

This was not strictly true, as the road to Gori shows. Just outside of the town are the remains of a Georgian armored personnel carrier demolished by a Russian fighter bomber, and right next to it a civilian Zhiguli car flattened by the blast.

Georgian soldiers retreating down the road from Gori on Aug. 11 told reporters one of the reasons they were pulling out was that they had few means to fight the Russian jets – quite in keeping with Georgia's misguided NATO-style training, which assumes a technically-inferior opponent.

As a result, at the end of the road to Gori, throughout the South Ossetia war, Georgian soldiers and even average citizens have been nervous about any noise from the sky.

In Gori's central square, where a Dutch reporter was killed either by strafing or a mortar barrage, depending on the eyewitness, the rumble of a Russian jet sent pedestrians for cover in doorways and under trees. Then the jet went about its business and the people in the square – Gori residents looking after their property and a few journalists – went their own ways. A smell of smoke hung in the air, as the Russians had been dropping bombs on a Georgian tank base nearby and sometimes they missed.

A reserve soldier who asked to be called Timur said he and his mates had been handed Kalashnikovs, stationed in Gori's main square, and left without food, water or orders for two days. Russian fighter bombers strafed or bombed the tank base nearby from time to time, but sometimes the Russians aimed at the square and so, according to Timur, his entire war was listening for the sound of a jet and hiding as necessary.

When Timur and the rest of the Georgian army pulled out ahead of the advancing Russians, the retreat from Gori was chaotic, with soldiers running to jump onto the beds of new Toyota pickup trucks bought for army, and inexperienced drivers bogging armored vehicles in ditches.

About five kilometers from Gori, on the highway, are the hulks of two Russian-made lorries, one an Ural and the second a Zil, smashed into each other in a catastrophic front-end collision.

But perhaps most telling of all, at the end of the South Ossetian war, the Georgian army was nowhere to be seen. Not a checkpoint, not a guard post, not even a private with a rifle ready and willing to stop the Russians from driving their tanks to Georgia's ancient capital of Tbilisi.

Saakashvili, hours after the ceasefire took effect, told Western reporters he was proud his Western-style army had maintained its "discipline and honor." As part of a ceasefire agreement engineered with great fanfare by French President Nicolas Sarkozy, the Russian army was to stay out of Georgia and Gori, and the Georgian army was to return to its bases.

Less than 12 hours after that agreement, heralded by Western governments as the first step towards a peace in the Caucasus, a Russian army motor rifle unit, Chechnya veterans mostly, drove into Gori, in blithe violation of the ceasefire agreement, according to Czech and German reporters on the scene.

The best part of Georgia's U.S.-trained army, a brigade of some 2,000 men, was in Iraq when the South Ossetia war broke out. The Americans brought the brigade home on Air Force cargo planes, and by the second-to-last day of the war, that brigade of desert veterans was back home to protect the Georgian homeland.

Then Sarkozy's ceasefire came and, like the rest of the Georgian army, the Iraq brigade went back to its bases. When the Russians came to Gori, per the terms of the ceasefire, there were no Georgians there to oppose them.

Relaxing vacation comes to abrupt end when war breaks out

By ALINA RUDYA
rudya@kpmmedia.ua

I spent four days in Tbilisi, two of which were marvelous – a trip to the ancient land of the epic 12th Century poem, Knight in the Panther's Skin. People were friendly, the weather was beautiful, the food was delicious and the wine, well, I don't need to speak about Georgian wine, its taste speaks for itself.

But on the night of Aug. 9, everything changed. No bombs were dropped onto Tbilisi itself, but the character of the city changed overnight. Outdoor cafes were still full with people, but now they were mostly discussing politics and watching news from the conflict zone. Internet cafes were full of foreign tourists trying to change their flights and get out quickly. I did too. The $140 price I paid for my ticket to Tbilisi grew to $550 for my return trip to Ukraine.

My Georgian friends were crying. Their friends and brothers were mobilized and sent to the war zone. Another friend of mine was stuck in a mini-bus on the way to Gori, when Russian "peacekeepers" started bombing the city. As we learned of the bombs dropped on Gori and Poti, two cities outside the territory of South Ossetia, we were both shocked and frightened.

Now people with Georgian national flags were all over Tbilisi. Many demonstrations against the war and against the Russian presence in Georgia took place. I saw Georgian refugees from Tshinvali, the capital of South Ossetia, standing by the parliament. Most of them lost everything in few days. These people didn't want Russia or Georgia to win. They just wanted the fighting to stop.

My American friend Nicole was evacuated by the American embassy to Yerevan, Armenia. The Ukrainian embassy in Georgia also offered me a ride in a military plane to Ukraine, but I decided to get back on my own. On Sunday night, the Tbilisi international airport was deserted – only a couple of flights were not cancelled and my flight to Kyiv was one of them.

Just 15 minutes before departure, I experienced war myself – a bomb, dropped by a Russian airplane, exploded across the landing field, just 200 meters from me. All passengers were immediately evacuated, but after a hour we departed.

The only thing I can think now is for the war to stop and an end to the bombing of Georgia, homeland of my friends Lika, Eka, Mariam and many others who don't deserve their lives to be broken with bombs.

Thefts from luggage common at Boryspil airport

Many travelers to and from Boryspil International Airport find their valuables are missing when they open their suitcases. Prosecutors say major airlines last year reported 11,000 thefts, many of which are believed to be inside jobs by airport police officers and baggage handlers in cahoots with each other. (PHL)

"Agent" Shevchenko, however, says that these measures are a pretense more than anything else. "There was a case when a handler got caught, but then was exonerated by the court. That's because they all cover up for each other."

He also found out that many handlers had criminal convictions in the past. The prosecutors have confirmed this information.

At the popular Ukrainian aviation portal, www.aviation.com.ua, a technician working for one of the airlines laid out his observations of luggage theft in Boryspil. Wishing to remain anonymous, he wrote that the airport's security system is corrupt all the way through. He said that a point of travel or an air company makes no difference to those who steal. He advised that locks or cellophane wrappings were no obstacles to handlers who can pinch anything, even perfume.

Since handling companies are hired by the airport, airlines complain of little control over passengers' bags. Nevertheless, airlines are liable for lost or stolen luggage at the end of a flight.

Ukraine handles complaints under the Warsaw Convention, an airline responsibility system that allows companies to reimburse passengers for lost luggage according to the recorded weight of a suitcase, not by the actual value of its contents. These rules set airline liability at $20 per kilo with a maximum of $640 per suitcase.

So, if a $500 camera weighing just 400 grams has been looted by baggage inspectors, one is likely to get only $8 back for it.

The General Prosecutor's Office, which has investigated the theft problem, points fingers at the police department in Boryspil. Prosecutors have replaced an entire squad in the airport and approached Minister of Interior Yuriy Lutsenko to punish higher-ranking officials for negligence. They also advise air carriers to install security cameras in airplane's bellies.

Major airlines for their part suggest diversifying luggage handling companies to prevent theft.

Shevchenko from "Undercover Agents" agrees with Boryspil officials that bag-lifting is an international problem. But in Ukraine, he says, "it's a trend of threatening dimensions." Outside of Ukraine, pilfering is so rare that major European carriers do not even distinguish between pilfered and other mishandled bags when filing their reports to the Association of European Airlines.

The journalist believes, however, that tolerance for the thefts will decline as the General Prosecutor's Office shines a spotlight on the problem.

For the time being, Ukrainian airport officials advise travelers to pack smart and zip valuables into carry-on bags.

Ukraine: Russian ships need permission to return

(AP) Ukraine's pro-Western president displayed his support for Georgia by issuing a decree Wednesday barring Russian ships from returning to their base in Ukraine without permission from Kyiv.

President Viktor Yushchenko's decree requires Russia's Black Sea Fleet to submit a request, 10 days in advance, for ships seeking to return to the base Moscow leases in the Crimea.

A Russian naval squadron has been deployed to Georgia's coast as part of the military action against that country.

Yushchenko's statement reflected

Kyiv's strong support for Georgia, which, like Ukraine, is trying to wrest itself from Russia's influence and wants to integrate with the West and join NATO.

Ukraine's Foreign Ministry warned Russia on Sunday that Kyiv reserved the right to bar Russian ships from returning to the base in Sevastopol, saying that their mission near Georgia's coast has the potential to draw Ukraine into the Russian-Georgian conflict over the breakaway Georgian province of South Ossetia.

Georgia launched an offensive Friday to regain control over the inland province, and Russia responded by sending in tanks and troops and bombing Georgian territory.

Under a 1997 lease agreement, Russia's Black Sea Fleet is permitted remain in the port of Sevastopol through 2017, but Ukrainian officials have said they want it out after that.

The issue adds to emotions over Crimea, which was part of the Russian Federation but ceded to Ukraine during the Soviet era and became part of the independent Ukraine when the Soviet Union collapsed in 1991.

NATO now!

Russia's successful blitz through South Ossetia, Abkhazia and other parts of Georgia was a rude wake-up call. Other than Tbilisi, the capital most in shock is Kyiv. Just over a week ago, the thought of Russia invading Ukraine to solve territorial or political disputes – such as the simmering one in Sevastopol over the Russian Black Sea Fleet – was ludicrous. After the events in Georgia, it is not so laughable.

Ukraine's Ministry of Foreign Affairs must be disconcerted by the ineffectual European, American and world response to the crisis. While Russians bombed and paratroopers rolled into Georgia, the West bombarded the Kremlin with diplomatic dispatches.

Ukraine finds itself in a precarious geopolitical situation. Russia truly represents a threat to an independent Ukraine. Moreover, Ukraine – like Georgia – is facing this threat on its own. The nation's leaders must finally realize their isolation and vulnerability.

After wasting 17 years on political squabbles fueled by the redistribution of Soviet-era wealth, the nation is not secure. Ukraine, stuck between Hitler and Stalin in World War II, doesn't have a favorable geographic position or friendly neighbors. Instead, Russian Prime Minister Vladimir Putin is reported to have openly sneered at the idea of Ukraine being a sovereign nation.

Russia's adventurism in Georgia was meant to send the bluntest of signals to its neighbors: "Don't get too cozy with the West, because we rule this region." The fossilized communists and other Kremlin toadies all too willingly obey. But such a subservient response will only take Ukraine backwards.

To the contrary, the solution is for Ukraine to join the North Atlantic Treaty Organization military alliance. Ukraine will have a better fate with NATO, a grouping of 26 democratic European and North American countries, rather than with Kremlin autocrats.

"NATO now!" should be the new rallying cry for all politicians in Ukraine. But as we have seen, the Kremlin-friendly Party of Regions and ex-Prime Minister Victor Yanukovich are determined to block and delay.

The desire of France and Germany not to irritate Russia, which supplies a quarter of Europe's natural gas, is blamed for the April decision at the NATO summit in Bucharest to delay the membership applications of Ukraine and Georgia.

Ukraine's political divisions and the ambivalence of average Ukrainians also contribute to wariness from the West. It's all the more unfortunate because, outside of the three Baltic states, Ukraine and Georgia are the only two relatively bright spots for democracy among the 15 former Soviet republics.

Ukraine needs to take a couple of other steps as well.

Faced with a resurgent Russia, Ukraine's military needs billions of hryvnias to improve its readiness and bring it closer to NATO standards. Ukraine's leaders should also press for an earlier exit of Russia's Black Sea Fleet from the nation's territory than 2017, the year the current agreement expires.

It's hard to say exactly who is to blame for the start-up of the hostilities between Georgia and Russia. Did South Ossetian separatists provoke Georgia with violence? Or did Georgian President Mikheil Saakashvili blunder by invading the separatist province without anticipating the fury of the Russian response?

Either way, Ukraine and the Caucasus have similar circumstances that make them ripe for provocations.

Ukraine has a large ethnic Russian population that the Kremlin courts in its unyielding opposition to attempts at Western integration and NATO membership. Crimea has plenty of Russian troops and Russian passport holders, creating the opportunity for Kremlin leaders to justify an invasion as essential to protecting its citizens, as they did in South Ossetia.

Ukraine can start with a public education campaign on the benefits of NATO membership. With all the disinformation out there, such information is essential. But a campaign will take time and money to change public opinion.

Western leaders, meanwhile, should recognize that their ambivalence to Ukraine and Georgia is encouraging Russia to menace and threaten beyond the Caucasus and Black Sea.

LETTERS TO THE EDITOR

'Not sexy' editorial misses point

Dear Editor,

In the Aug. 7 editorial "Not sexy," the writer legitimately argues against the sex trade but fails to recognize the prime reason for the flourishing industry. Ukraine suffers from intense gender discrimination (the idea that women should be at home raising the family, while the man's place is at work). This disparity is the root cause of the burgeoning sex industry.

The author says young women should be "using their brains" and "climbing the corporate ladder." But who is actively encouraging them to do so? A recent report by Human Rights Watch stated: "Gender discrimination in Ukraine is cutting women out of the work force while the Ukrainian government is doing nothing to stop the problem." Employers focus on archaic stereotypes rather than professional qualifications. They can place job advertisements and specify that the applicant must be male, and they have the right to question a woman about her family circumstances and deny her employment based on her answers. When the most frequent job available to women is caretaker, and the highest-level position a woman can aspire to is executive secretary, climbing the corporate ladder is not an option.

And when left with little economic choice, perhaps a few women do knowingly choose to enter the sex industry. But can this really be considered a choice when little to no other options exist? Or when her choice lies between selling herself or starving – or worse yet, seeing her family starve?

However, the implication that most women choose prostitution is absurd. Perhaps there are the few women who enter willingly, trying to seize upon a piece of the glam lifestyle afforded to their richer counterparts, but they are the exception. Reports state that the sex industry depends largely on forced labor and that the majority of women are tricked or coerced into prostitution. The article vilifies Ukrainian women while implying that Ukrainian men are completely innocent in these transactions, and that only foreigners are to blame. But rarely are women selling sex on their own. Behind the scenes there is always the male pimp, quite possibly a native Ukrainian who profits most. It is men who must stop buying sex before the industry will cease.

Lastly, I find it laughable that the Kyiv Post would publish this article and on the following page have advertisements for "finding your Ukrainian beauty today." I, too, applaud the efforts of FEMEN and their protest, but apparently their message was unclear if the author of this article came away with the idea that it is women who are at fault. Until Ukraine recognizes gender discrimination and takes steps to address the economic disparity resulting from it – and until messages such as the one promoted in this editorial disappear – Ukrainian women will be left with little choice as to how they survive, and the sex industry will continue to flourish.

Sex tourism story insults women

Dear Editor,

I am a regular reader of the Kyiv Post newspaper, a Ukrainian working and living in France. I have never written comments before concerning the articles provided by the Kyiv Post until today when I read your Aug. 7 front-page article "Rising sex tourism unwelcome."

You started off good by writing about protests that Ukrainian women held on Independence Square, as well as writing about the FEMEN nongovernmental organization that noticed the sex tourism boom in Ukraine and is trying to counteract this trend.

But then you literally advertise sex tourism in Ukraine by citing Vasyl Myroshnychenko, a partner at CFC, a strategic communications, government relations and investment consulting firm, who said: "Ukraine has a competitive advantage, simply put, our women are the best in the world!" Since the Kyiv Post mainly targets foreign readers, sex tourism is promoted in an indirect way!

Not to mention the passage where you advertise the website www.kiev-tour.com by providing details of the party that can be booked online. Also you mention the prices $1,250-$1,600, "depending on the type of girl and her English-speaking skills" – the price that is affordable for a foreigner for these kind of services! You provide advantages for the customer's financial security: "the site offers confidentiality and discreet billing, private cottages outside of Kyiv or apartments in the capital, round-trip transport to Boryspil airport and discounts for longer stays."

Why would a foreigner go to Thailand if they can have "the best women in the world" in Ukraine for a very good price?

Is this where the Kyiv Post newspaper gets financing from? By receiving money from such businesses as prostitution in Ukraine? I thought the whole point was to stop prostitution, rather than promote it.

It is very sad and a shame to write and then publish the article that humiliates Ukrainian women in the eyes of a foreign reader. I believe it is unacceptable for the European press to publish an article like "Rising sex tourism unwelcome," since the Kyiv Post is one of the few English-language newspapers in Ukraine for an increasing number of foreigners (23 million visited the country in 2007, as you say).

His words helped destroy evil

Yuriy Lukanov

One should never speak ill of the dead, but this courtesy does not apply to those who were truly prominent in life. The proof of this became clear once again after the death of distinguished Russian writer and Nobel Prize winner Alexander Solzhenitsyn. He died from a stroke at the age of 89 in Moscow. He was buried on Aug. 6 in Donskoy Monastery in Moscow.

In life, Soviet leaders persecuted Solzhenitsyn. He was exiled from the country and lived in the United States for many years. In death, Russian leaders came to say goodbye to him.

“SOLZHENITSYN STOPPED BEING A CONSISTENT CRITIC OF THE SOVIET SYTEM AND SUDDENLY STARTED SPEAKING AGAINST THE DISMANTLING OF THE SOVIET UNION.”

— Yuriy Lukanov

This is ironic because, with his work, he condemned the inhumane regime of the Soviet Union, whose collapse has been called “the greatest tragedy of the 20th century” by Russian Prime Minister Vladimir Putin.

But times change.

Tomorrow in Russia Solzhenitsyn might be crucified as a traitor. I came to this conclusion after reading comments about Solzhenitsyn’s death. He was called a mudslinger, a twister of the Soviet reality and the like.

Similar things are happening on Ukrainian forums, except the motivation behind the Ukrainian comments is different. Some people here say that he was a chauvinist, KGB stool pigeon and Ukraine hater.

The life and work of Solzhenitsyn once again confirms that humans are made of many contradictions. First, he exposed the Soviet regime. Later, he made statements that were heavily criticized by anti-communists.

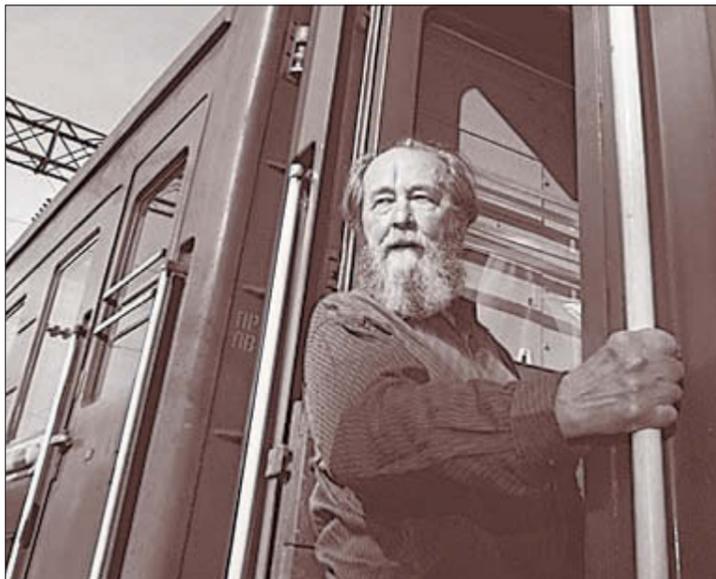

His book “One Day in the Life of Ivan Denisovich” described the life of a prisoner in those dreadful northern camps. His description of a single person’s life summarizes the fates of millions of innocent people exiled by Stalin. The story was lucky enough to get published in the Soviet Union during a short-lived liberalization of the regime in 1960s.

The author received a Nobel Prize for it. But his main masterpiece is the multi-volume Gulag Archipelago. He created a complete portrait of a country that mercilessly punished anyone it considered an enemy. The enemy status was given not just to the real opponents, but to masses of Soviet citizens.

They were tortured mercilessly – not just literally, but in the social sense as well. The social torture was confiscation of property. Villagers were forced into collective farms that were economically inefficient. There were artificial famines when people lost their minds for lack of food and ate other people – even their own children – but couldn’t survive anyway.

There were real literal tortures behind the walls of Soviet secret service headquarters where people were seated opposite a very bright light, and they felt as if their brain was being filled with liquid lead. Their fingers were crushed with doors. They were thrown naked into punishment cells with no room for sitting and lying, and in one centimeter deep cold water.

Because publishing activity was strictly censored at that time by the Author and former Soviet dissident Alexander Solzhenitsyn boards a train near Moscow in 1994, 20 years after his exile from the Soviet Union for exposing the evils of the communist system. In recent years, the winner of the 1970 Nobel Prize for Literature grew fond of Russian Prime Minister Vladimir Putin for restoring national pride. (wikimedia.org) government, its opponents circulated their works through the underground samizdat. They were printed on a regular typewriter, or even copied by hand, and spread around in tens or hundreds of copies – at best.

Gulag Archipelago was printed by samizdat, and then ended up in the West. It was then reprinted and aired on Radio Liberty. A good few opponents of the Communist system were brought up on this book. It played a key role in formulating their view of the world.

For Ukrainians, what was important in this book was the description of fighters of the Ukrainian Insurgent Army (UPA). For years, it was portrayed by Soviet propaganda as a nationalistic gang serving Hitler. Even now some Ukrainians continue repeating the communist stereotypes that were forced on them about the army that fought during World War II for an independent Ukraine, against both the Soviets and the Germans.

The organized armed anti-communist resistance survived in Ukraine until 1950, much longer than in other republics. Some fighting even occurred at the beginning of 1960s. The Ukrainian partisans were sent straight to GULAG (abbreviation for Main Department for Prison Camps) from forests where they had been caught.

Solzhenitsyn wrote that the imprisoned independence fighters were horrified by the spirit of slavery that reigned in camps. He said Ukrainians inspired and organized a series of revolts in camps. His positive description of the Ukrainian rebels was an inconceivable sin from the point of view of Soviet ideologists.

After his return to the USSR just before its collapse, Solzhenitsyn stopped being a consistent critic of the Soviet system and suddenly started speaking against the dismantling of the Soviet Union.

Shortly before the Ukrainian proclamation of independence on August 24, 1991, Solzhenitsyn came to Kyiv to try and persuade the citizens that the pro-independence movement was a communist trick.

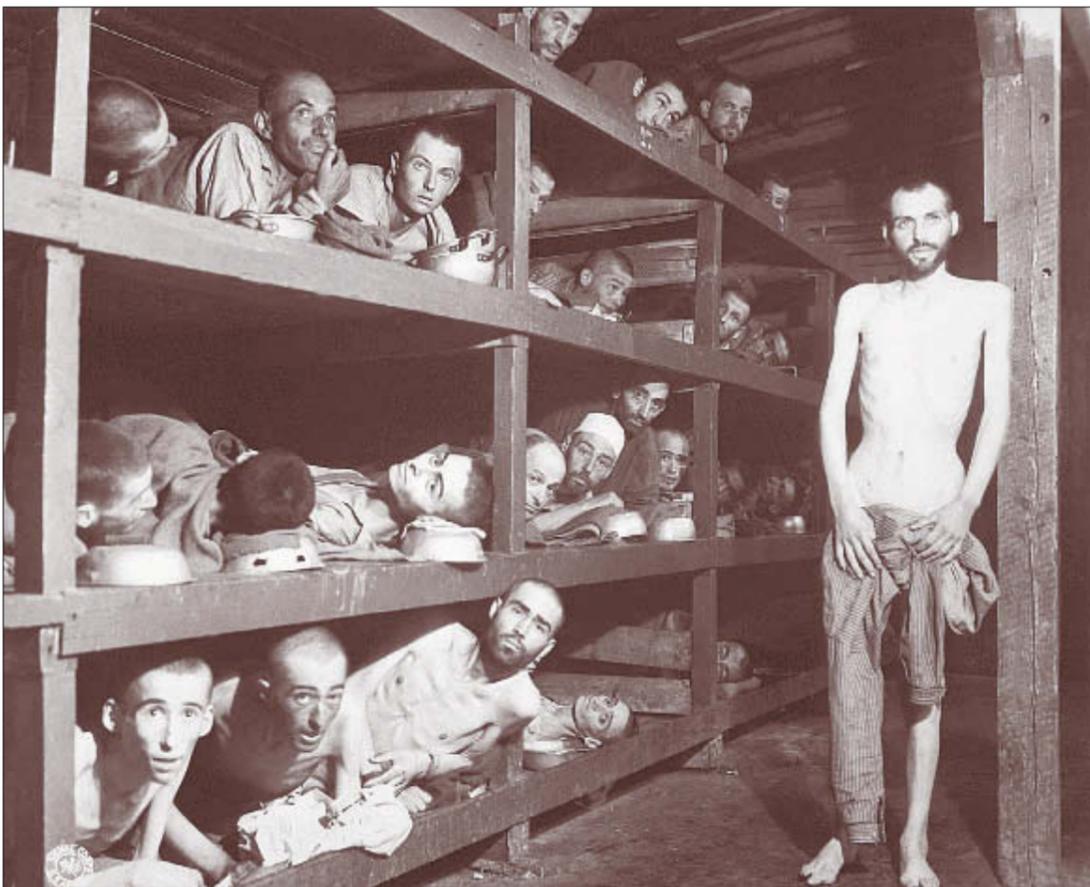

He met with activists of the nationalistic Rukh (Movement) organization that pushed for independence. Among them were some political prisoners who spent even more time in Soviet camps than the author of the Gulag Archipelago.

Later, one of these prisoners who spent 26 years in camps, Levko Lukianenko, said Solzhenitsyn had been recruited by the secret services, and one of his reports foiled a rebellion planned by Ukrainian inmates.

A few months ago, Solzhenitsyn made a statement which said that the 1932-33 famine was not an act of genocide against Ukrainians. He was then accused of chauvinism. It’s interesting that earlier, in his Gulag Archipelago, he truthfully described many horrors of that famine.

Maybe one day, in another world, all our truthful and faulty deeds will be put on scales and one of the sides will outbalance the other. I think that the Gulag Archipelago will outweigh everything else that was done by Solzhenitsyn. Because this very book helped tear down the evil that its author later tried to save. It helped tear down the USSR.

Victims of Soviet dictators Josef Stalin’s gulags. Nobel Prize winner Alexander Solzhenitsyn achieved international fame for his books, One Day in the Life of Ivan Denisovich, which exposed the horrors of the gulag system, and Gulag Archipelago, a three-volume account of the mass repressions and vast prison camps in the Soviet Union from 1918 to 1956. Solzhenitsyn went on to become a critic of Western materialism and the way that Russia’s oligarchs acquired their wealth after the Soviet collapse. (wikimedia.org)

How should Ukraine react if Russia starts an aggressive action on its territory as in Georgia?

Sergei Ribak Security guard

“First of all Russia will never invade Ukraine, not even for Sevastopol. This thesis is ridiculous for many reasons. We shouldn’t draw such conclusions from the ongoing Russia-Georgia conflict. It’s too different.”

Elena Guzva Housewife

Mid-sized domestic market researchers fill emerging niches

By YULIA GOLUB
golub@kpmmedia.ua

The growing sophistication of Ukrainian businesses is propelling demand for detailed market information and specialized studies. This means booming business for market research firms. With annual revenue growth of 25 to 30 percent, this segment of the economy is one of the fastest-growing in Europe, according to the Ukrainian Association of Marketing.

"Although, if we would consider 17 percent inflation, then the real growth would be 13 percent," cautioned Dmitri Rodenko, director of International Marketing Group Ukraine.

The structure of the market has evolved since the late 1990s when it was dominated by large international firms. "Now we are talking about many medium-sized market research businesses entering the market," says Alexander Fedorishin, director of GfK Ukraine. "Today, 60 percent of the market is controlled by international outfits, the remainder by domestic firms."

The industry restructured because Ukrainian companies are becoming market savvy and require specialized research. It's the smaller companies that provide the tailored services. "Ukrainian research companies are filling the new narrowly defined niches," says Rodenko. The examples of niches new in the Ukrainian market are automotive lubricants, construction materials, entertainment and leisure research. "The companies in these niches use sophisticated methods such as price elasticity studies and customer satisfaction indexes (CSI)," said Tatyana Zhelomyrska, managing partner at TouchPoll Research.

TOP LIST

That doesn't mean the firms focusing on traditional market sectors are suffering. Large market leaders are flourishing with the rising demand for research in traditional sectors such as fast-moving consumer goods and media, both of which are experiencing tremendous growth.

The market is still dominated by a handful of firms, which control nearly 75 percent of the market. "Today, 25 percent Ukraine's market is controlled by GfK, 14 percent belongs to The Nelson Company retail research specialist, and UP and TNS control 13 and 12 percent respectively," Fedorishin said.

The possible merger of international giants GfK and TNS will have little impact on the local market, said Fedorishin, although it will strengthen his company's hold on the market here and make GfK "overall, the number one research company in the world."

But the merger remains merely a possibility. WPP, one of the largest market research firms in the world, held up GfK's TNS buyout by offering to purchase the company for almost $2.1 billion. Since then, TNS has been courting other potential buyers. At this point, Fedorishin says "we definitely will not merge with TNS, but someone will buy TNS," adding, "whether it will be us or WPP will be determined through negotiations."

Experts forecast that intensifying competition and the growing number of research firms will only benefit industry clients. Over time, companies will implement more modern techniques that allow yet more tailored research. "Of course, Ukraine will follow the international trend of using online surveys and internet panels," said Olena Zhytnyk, marketing director at InMind market research agency.

Alexander Fedorishin

Insiders see only more robust growth ahead. "In 2009, we can expect 30-35 percent growth," said Serhiy Golub, head of analytics department at Kanzas Research Company. Demand from real estate, pharmaceutical and automotive sectors "will be the leading trend for research companies in Ukraine over the next three to five years," Rodenko said.

Demand booms despite reluctance to outsource research

By YULIA GOLUB
golub@kpmmedia.ua

Kishor H. Sridhar is head of international business at the German IEAK Institute, which has been in Kyiv since 2007. The company evaluates cultural mentalities and their impact on consumer behavior. Before joining IEAK, Sridhar worked for the American Gallup Institute. Sridhar says Ukrainian businesses are slowly adopting modern market research techniques and still rely on old-fashioned approaches.

KP: Please tell us briefly about the major trends currently driving Ukraine's market research sector?

KS: The Ukrainian market is fast-moving and quickly adapts new approaches and technologies. We are overwhelmed on how well perceived innovative technologies are. Modern online shopping-shelf simulations are in demand as well as the new eye-tracking method that measures what people look at while they move along the street, at the shop or when reading a newspaper. This has definitely changed compared to a few years ago.

On the other hand, Ukrainian customer research still applies some rather old-fashioned approaches. We still do a lot of our work in classical ways, for example, person-to-person and telephone interviewing.

In Western European countries, the latter method holds a small share of the market research market but in Ukraine, it will remain a major source of data gathering for years to come.

KP: What are the major factors that are driving the market growth?

KS: The major factors are stronger competition in the consumer goods sector and a greater product diversification. It's only natural that when competition increases and growth is harder to gain, companies turn to market research.

Knowledge and information are the keys to success and many Ukrainian companies know it. Companies without a detailed knowledge of their market or customers get left behind. This is a natural development. This also works for advertisement. With customers being flooded by advertisements, you need to make sure that yours stand out. We have seen a major growth in campaign testing in Ukraine over the past years.

KP: What are the main challenges that market researchers face today?

KS: The main challenge for all market research players is the lack of willingness of their potential client's decision makers to hear the truth. It is difficult to hear straight facts about what your customers think of your product, and what your market chances are, if the findings are negative. When you are ill, you don't treat yourself, you go to a doctor for an honest evaluation. The same should be true for market research, but it isn't. Many corporate decision makers prefer to use their own people for market research, but most lack modern know-how. Naturally, many base their findings on their bosses' views. This is called alibi research.

If executives want to be successful, they need independent market research and consulting on which they can base their decisions. Good market researchers are comfortable telling the truth, and the findings are highly confidential, like any good doctor's medical opinions. But this open-mindedness among the country's executives still needs to develop. That is why only 15 percent of market research in Ukraine is done by independent market research companies. We are very sure that this will change quickly but this is something we as independent market research companies actively need to work on.

KP: So the demand for market research in Ukraine is underdeveloped?

KS: No it is not sufficiently developed. There are many international market research companies expanding into the Ukrainian market but opening offices does not guarantee the real demand is met. The Ukrainian market is a very dynamic yet special market. Demands are different in Ukraine so the main challenge for international market research companies is to adapt their approach to the country's unique market and clients.

KP: What are the main differences in the research you do in Ukraine and Western companies?

KS: There are three major differences. First, it is the clients: Ukrainians are very dynamic, fast thinking and move quickly. In the West, in Germany for example, market research clients will plan weeks ahead. Projects in Ukraine come on short notice and require a quick turn-around.

The other difference is the way participants are interviewed. Cell phone usage rates in the Ukraine are on a very high level and landline penetration in the major cities is too. That is why telephone interviewing works well here. In the regions it is better to conduct market research in person. This communication mix will last for the next years to come. Last but not least are the challenges Ukrainian clients face and thus the fields of research. For example real estate research is very big in Ukraine, meaning the detailed evaluation of a location where a retailer plans his store, the evaluation of the area, the demographics around the store, family structure, income, mobility, etc. In Germany their meta-surveys continuously monitor customer behavior. In Ukraine data is gathered more on an individual, case-driven basis.

KP: What is your forecast for the development of the market research sector in Ukraine?

KS: The annual 30 percent growth rate will continue for the next 3 years. Among the most areas in demand of market research will be in real estate, mobile communication, banks and retail.

In terms of technology we first have to fully develop telephone interviewing and the transition to internet data gathering will take another three to five years. The internet offers possibilities still beyond anything we have seen so far in market research. I am quite sure that online market research will catch on even faster in Ukraine than it did in the UK, Germany or France.

Threat to Ukraine seen in Georgia war

By DARIYA ORLOVA
orlova@kpmmedia.ua

Russia's attack on Georgia last week raised fears that Ukraine might be the next victim of a regional Kremlin power grab.

Russia sent troops to South Ossetia, the breakaway Georgian province, on Aug. 7 to repel Georgian forces. Georgian President Mikheil Saakashvili justified the incursion with claims that separatist forces in South Ossetia had attacked Georgians.

The Russians said they entered to bring peace and to protect the lives of Russians living in the disputed region. This pretext for Russian force could easily be used in many post-Soviet countries.

The events were particularly disquieting for many in Ukraine, where nearly eight million ethnic Russians constitute the country's largest national minority. Many Russians are concentrated in eastern Ukraine and in Crimea.

Relations between Russia and Ukraine are strained by the presence of Russia's Black Sea Fleet, which is based in Sevastopol, the Crimean port city, at least until 2017. While many in Ukraine want the fleet to leave, Russian leaders have been making noises about staying longer.

Russia is also vehemently opposed to attempts by Ukraine and Georgia to join the North Atlantic Treaty Organization military alliance.

"If the West swallows the pill and forgives Russia the Georgian war, the invasion of 'peacekeeping tanks' into Ukraine will just be a matter of time," Oleksandr Sushko, research director at the Kyiv-based Institute for Euro-Atlantic Cooperation, wrote in an opinion article on Ukrainska Pravda, a leading online publication, on Aug. 12.

Russian experts say Ukraine is overreacting. "There are no direct parallels between Ukraine [and Georgia]. I don't think there is a reason to be nervous," said Alexei Malashenko, an analyst with the Moscow office of the Carnegie Endowment for International Peace.

But Ukrainians aren't the only ones concerned about Russia's newfound boldness. Svante Cornell, Washington-based research director of the Central Asia-Caucasus Institute & Silk Road Studies Program Joint Center, told the Kyiv Post he has noticed Russian escalation and an increase in hostility towards Ukraine in recent months.

Crimea seems to be the focus.

Moscow Mayor Yuriy Luzhkov's visit to Sevastopol in May "was a typi-

"IF THE WEST...FORGIVES
RUSSIA THE GEORGIAN WAR, THE INVASION OF
'PEACEKEEPING TANKS' INTO UKRAINE WILL JUST BE A MATTER OF TIME."

cal Russian 'trial balloon,' followed by gradual moves to delegitimize Ukraine's territorial integrity over the Crimea," Cornell said. "If Moscow concludes it got away with its aggression in Georgia, it is likely that it will move on to stir up tensions in Ukraine."

The Crimean peninsula officially became a part of the Ukrainian Soviet Socialist Republic in 1954. The gift of the peninsula to Ukraine by Soviet leader Nikita Khrushchev still rankles Russian politicians. After the breakup of the Soviet Union, the Russian Black Sea Fleet remained in Crimea by mutual agreement.

But the presence of the Russian fleet on Ukrainian territory is a threat in itself, said Oleksandr Paliy, a Ukrainian Ministry of Foreign Affairs expert. "A conflict could be easily provoked, which (Russia) will present as a Ukrainian action. And then it will escalate," Paliy said, painting a scenario similar to the Russian-Georgia conflict.

The fleet got embroiled in the South Ossetia conflict. Russian warships sailed from Sevastopol to fight Georgian forces, prompting a warning from Ukraine's Ministry of Foreign Affairs that the ships might not be allowed to return until the conflict is resolved.

Ukraine's President Victor Yushchenko said the Russian use of its fleet in the attack on Georgia "is a dangerous precedent, because through such precedents Ukraine is unwillingly drawn into an international conflict."

Russia's Foreign Ministry shot back with a statement justifying the fleet's actions as perfectly legal.

While diplomats traded angry shots, Ukraine's political elite failed to take a unified stance on the conflict.

"Now the two states, both our strategic partners, are at war with each other, and we don't have a common position," said Anatoliy Hrytsenko, a parliament deputy and former defense minister. "So, should we wait for a war against Ukraine to unite?"

The Communist Party blamed Saakashvili for sending troops to South Ossetia. Party officials accused the United States of provoking a conflict to persuade Ukrainians and Georgians to join NATO. In April, a NATO summit delayed requests from Georgia and Ukraine to join the alliance.

"As long as Ukraine seeks NATO membership, and Western [countries] remain mute, Russia is likely to keep stirring up internal disputes in Ukraine," Hrytsenko said.

'New ecological settlers' shun city life to answer nature's call

By IRYNA PRYMACHYK
prymachyk@kpmmedia.ua

Imagine a life without electricity, hot water, telephones, shops and hairdressers. Some would call it a nightmare, but others make it their new lifestyle. Some would call them hermits, but they call themselves new ecological settlers.

There are more than 20 so-called eco-settlements in various regions of Ukraine, many of them in Kyiv region. Each has from 20 to 500 inhabitants, according to Voploshcheniye Mechty (A dream come true) web portal, which collects information on eco-settlements.

Who are these people? Why do they do it?

Two of them are Petro and Olga Rayevsky. Four years ago, they made their choice to move to the village of Romashki (Ox-Eye Daisies), 120 kilometers south of Kyiv. They moved to an old half-destroyed clay house, or mazanka, in Ukrainian. They say they got tired of the city life and escaped from their flat in Kyiv's Bereznyaky area on the left bank, where their parents still live.

Petro, 34, was a surgeon, and his wife Olga, 27, was a lawyer before they decided to make the big move and join what they call "a growing eco-settlers' community."

Petro has grown a long beard, and neither of them cut their nails. They are soft-spoken, move slowly and look very young indeed. They say that they spend their time walking bare-foot, skinny dipping in the local lake and cooking on an open fire outside their house and waking up with the sun at 4 a.m.

"We all are children of the Earth, but only a few people understand it. We don't work, and have no money because all we need for a happy life we grow here," Olga said.

The Rayevskys rebuilt the house they live in with their own hands, using clay, sand and straw. "We want to live just the way our forefathers lived many years ago. Even my mobile phone has fallen into a well and I think it was a sign from above," Petro said.

They use candles for light and sleep on straw and pine-tree branches. In the winter they burn wood in their clay stove and sleep on it. "It is very hot and we have to open the door," Petro said.

Petro Rayevsky was a surgeon in Kyiv, but four years ago decided to leave the capital and his flat behind for life in a village settlement 120 kilometers from Kyiv. In the village of Romashki, Petro, his wife and their 3-year-old daughter live without electricity, hot water, telephones and other modern conveniences. There are an estimated 20 such "eco-settlements" in Ukraine. (Iryna Prymachyk)

They bake their own bread and feed dogs with the bread their parents occasionally bring them from Kyiv. Both are strict vegetarians, even though they have plenty of golden carps in the nearest lake.

"It is bad to destroy nature. It feeds us with fruit and vegetables. In summer they are fresh and in winter we dry them. But we eat not like in town, not physically but more spiritually. We don't need to eat much and here we are never ill," Petro said.

Psychologists say eco-settlements such as the one Petro and Olga live in represent people's longing for harmony with nature.

"Eco-settlements spring up because of the clash that exists in every city between the natural human need for safety and feelings of helplessness in daily life," said Regina Shevchenko, a professional social psychologist. She thinks the movement is unlikely to ever gain wide popularity.

Many eco-settlers are not as radical as the Rayevskys. They prefer to retain their jobs and some comforts after moving out of the city, and consider it their mission to popularize the ecological way of life.

Andriy Kovalevsky, 28, who has lived in Romashki for three years, still works as an economist in Kyiv, has electricity in his mazanka and uses a notebook for work. "Each week I go to the capital to bring fresh eco-energy to town people, to keep the connection and spread our idea of life among other people," he said.

According to the settlers' philosophy, all diseases come from bad thoughts. Children in cities cry a lot because they feel the bad city energy. They say any settlement has its own energy, even their own.

"It does not let bad people in," Rayevsky said. "Some people can look for it and never find it."

Even good people, however, can get lost in the tall grass that almost completely obscures a little sign with the name Romashki. Rayevskys' parents are among them.

They find it difficult to appreciate the eco-lifestyle.

"I was shocked when I realized my son was going to move to that village. I even gave him a separate flat just to stop them," Petro's mother said. "Initially, we thought they are too young and a single winter would be enough to make them come back. But they stayed and in time I realized they are different than we are."

Over time, Petro's mother even got used to skinny dipping. She visits monthly to see her 3-year-old granddaughter Ulianka.

The little girl fits right in: She hides from outsiders and dislikes city toys.

Olga believes her daughter has acquired telepathic abilities because she was born in the village.

"She can use telepathy, which our forefathers had many years ago," the girl's mother said. "Even we, when we need something, can just imagine it and our parents come with that exact thing. She has even more of such abilities."

Psychologists say she may be right.

"Ordinary people think it is just a lucky coincidence, but people with a pure energy stream deliberately can focus their energy on that special thing and it looks like it comes from nowhere," said Eugenia Serbinova, a Kyiv psychologist.

There are about 50 eco-settlers like the Rayevskys living in Romashki, plus other "ordinary" residents – mostly elderly people who were born there and who enjoy the modern conveniences of electricity, gas, running hot water and TV. They all know about the "young strangers" and say their own grandchildren more often just to see the "weird" new residents.

The eco-settlers "usually come to talk to us, and even try to persuade us to join them," said Kateryna Dehtun, a neighbor. "First we thought they were crazy, but now got used to them swimming naked in the winter."

The Rayevskys say more people are coming to see them in the village because they are attracted by the lifestyle and want to move there.

"First we ask them to live there the same way we do: in a tent or even in one of the old half-ruined houses, at least for a year," Petro said. "If they can do it, we welcome them into our common family. Now more and more people realize the idea of a remote community is good but requires a dramatic change in values."

Meet The Dark Knight

By OLGA KOVALENKO

olga.kovalenko@kpmmedia.ua

This summer's top film sensation, The Dark Knight, has finally arrived in Kyiv. So, the local viewers will now get a chance to appraise the film and see if it's really worth all the accolades it has been receiving on top of the record-breaking box office receipts. The film is currently rated in third place for all-time favorite movies at imdb.com, which makes you wonder what was so incredibly good in the film that it deserves to be listed with the classics. Perhaps, there is nothing more than the sudden death of Heath Ledger, the actor who plays the infamous villain Joker, that attracted the audiences to the theaters?

One way or another, the latter had something to do with it, and it's also clear that it's not Batman himself (played by Christian Bale) everyone is interested in – this time all eyes are focused on his arch-enemy, the Joker.

Long before Hollywood film director Christopher Nolan (Insomnia, The Prestige) laid his hands on it, the Batman character had gone through multiple interpretations. He appeared first as a comic book character in 1939, and was soon taken over by enthusiastic movie makers who took advantage of the lasting saga of his exploits and misfortunes.

Starting in a gloomy fantasy world created by Tim Burton in his Batman movie, and reducing to completely ridiculous in Batman & Robin, the movies have gone through a cast of superstars like Val Kilmer, George Clooney, Kim Basinger, Jack Nicholson, Danny Devito, Christopher Walken, Jim Carrey, and Nicole Kidman.

In his attempt to give the character a second birth, director Christopher Nolan digressed from Burton's films with their fairy-tale settings, black humor and carnival villains, and released Batman Begins in 2005, creating a much darker, gloomier image of the mysterious superhero, telling his story from the very beginning.

It all began when eight-year-old Bruce Wayne (Christian Bale) witnessed the murder of his parents and started to feel guilty for their deaths. The boy ends up under the influence of a mysterious instructor called Ducard, who urges him to become a ninja in the League of Shadows. However, Wayne returns to his native Gotham City, takes the name of Batman and starts cracking down on crime and corruption.

As in previous interpretations, the superhero is surrounded by friends – policeman Jim Gordon (played by Gary Oldman) and Alfred the butler (Michael Caine), and foes – Lucius Fox (Morgan Freeman) and Scarecrow (Cillian Murphy). To disguise his superhero identity, Bruce Wayne hides under the mask of a multi-billionaire playboy and philanthropist.

Unlike an average stereotypical superhero, Batman doesn't have any superpowers and relies on his knowledge in science, and tactics, as well as his martial arts, detective skills and pure physical abilities.

The Dark Knight, Nolan's newly released sequel to Batman Begins, features new villains, namely the fabulous Joker, and Two-Face played by Aaron Eckhart. The role of Batman's childhood friend and lover Rachel Dawes was given to Maggie Gyllenhaal, who replaced Katie Holmes from the previous movie. Like all Batman films, The Dark Knight has gathered an all-star cast.

But the tensest emotions, of course, rage around Joker – one of the last roles played by Heath Ledger, who was found dead last January in his New York apartment. Critics say that the role of Joker evoked the deepest of Ledger's acting abilities and that he can be called a worthy rival to Jack Nicholson, who starred as Joker in Tim Burton's Batman.

While working on the character, the designers were rumored to have drawn inspiration from such countercultural pop musicians as Pete Doherty, Iggy Pop, and Johnny Rotten. Indeed, Ledger's villain is scary and even disgusting – he certainly makes viewers cringe. And all the scarier he appears if you remember that the actor passed away before the movie was released, and the details of his death still remain controversial. Many Dark Knight posters feature Joker as the central figure of the film (which he certainly is), and display spooky images of the actor in horrible make-up, making him appear rather ghoulish.

often hear that foreigners coming to Kyiv consider our citizens to be very amiable, polite and cultured. Surely, it's all a matter of personal opinion as to what kind of people you have to deal with. As someone who has to ride public transport on a daily basis, I cannot always agree with these assessments.

When it comes to riding in public transportation, I have my own very personal pet peeves. Those include people standing too close to me in a half-full metro carriage or marshrutka, or when someone's bag is touching my legs. I hate to make remarks to strangers, and merely try to show them my displeasure by attempting to move away and throwing irritated looks at them. Also there are mildly annoying moments, when a couple of silly teenagers or a group of drunken grown-ups would talk and laugh really loudly, or a girl talking on the phone for half an hour, forcing the whole bus to listen to her empty conversation. Oh, and as a woman, I simply admire those guys who quickly slip in beside you to take a seat that gets freed right in front of you. Sure I understand – those poor tired Ukrainian men...

However, there are things that occur in public transport which I'm surely not the only one to find displeasing. For example, when a man sits next to me in a marshrutka with a beer in his lap, harassing me with the smell, and thinking it's all OK. But beer is the lesser of evils – someone might be eating a terribly smelling cheburek with meat and onions close by. Once, sitting and waiting for a marshrutka to take off, I heard a woman start loudly complaining about a man next to her, who was peeling and eating dried fish and sipping on beer. She urged the driver to throw the man out of the bus, but the driver asked the woman to shut up and other passengers likewise tried to silence her, saying the man wasn't bothering anybody. Never the one willing to make a scene in the bus, I easily understood the woman's contempt. However, as there are no laws regulating such things, nothing will be done about it, until people begin to realise it's entirely inappropriate behavior for "cultured" citizens, as opposed to monkeys in the Zoo.

"Venezuelan Art travels Around the World." Paintings by twenty Latin American artists.

The exhibition "Venezuelan Art Travels Around the World" already took place in Poland, Uruguay and soon it will reach Panama. The exhibition was initiated by Ukrainian artist Oleksiy Malykh. While visiting his students in Venezuela, he discovered an interesting art group Portico that formed in 2007. Twenty artists present different art pieces: abstract and subject compositions, classical paintings and works created using unique author's techniques. The member of Portico group, Azdrubal Morot, came to open the exhibition in Kyiv. RA, RA photo (32 Khmelnytskoho, 235-3619). Trough Aug. 28.

TUESDAY 19

"Sculptures Forest. 100 Best Sculptors of Ukraine".

In fact, 100 is a metaphor used by curators of the exhibition to create an atmosphere of the forest. Actually the "Sculptures Forest. 100 Best Sculptors of Ukraine" features several dozen of the most interesting, both experienced and young, Ukrainian artists, who work with small plastic objects. Two medium-sized halls of gallery are filled with statuettes from the ground to the ceiling. The exposition is enhanced by the touching and lovely small etchings of Olexiy Fedorenko. Da Vinci (5 Chervonoarmiyska, Arena Class, courtyard, first floor, 499-1376). Though Sept. 18.

THURSDAY 21

"China Forever". Paintings by Oleksandr Hnylytskiy, Ilya Chichcan and others.

Controversial and provocative reflections on Chinese culture are what several famous Ukrainian artists demonstrate at the "China Forever" exhibition. They are inspired by interesting facts connecting China and Ukraine. For example Ukrainian children playing with Chinese toys and their thrifty mothers laying a table with stuff from "Everything for Hr 8" shop. Some Chinese businessmen even introduce themselves as Natasha or Ivan when doing business with Ukrainian entrepreneurs. Chinese art breaks records at the auctions. And finally now, everybody's talking about China due to the Olympic Games. Atelier Karas (22A Andriyivskiy Uzviz, 238-6531). Though Sept. 8.

Stay cool! Indulge in your favorite guilty pleasure – ice cream

By MARIA LEONTIEVA
leontieva@kpmmedia.ua

Summer might be coming to an end, but there is still plenty of time to savor ice cream, the treat associated mostly with the warmer seasons. But of course, nothing can stop you from enjoying it any time of the year.

Although I have never actually tasted a real Italian gelato in the country of its origin, I have lately become a big fan of this wonderful treat, as more and more gelaterias of different chains have opened in Kyiv in the last couple of years.

There are two famous types of Italian ice cream, gelato and sorbet. Gelato is authentic Italian ice cream made from milk, egg yolks and sugar, combined with various flavorings. The flavors can come in fresh fruit, chocolate, flakes, nuts, small confections, cookies, or biscuits. The other type is fruit-based sorbet, made from fresh juice, iced fruit, or berry puree, most commonly wild strawberry and raspberry. Also there is yogurt-based ice cream, classic gelato with chocolate and hazelnuts, fruit mix with chocolate, pear with cottage cheese, etc. The main advantage of gelato is that it contains less fat than common American-style ice cream. Gelato is softer than other ice cream and melts faster, since its ingredients are not homogenized (blended) together. Generally gelato has 35% less than air, which gives it a denser texture.

The newest ice cream parlor in Kyiv, Gelateria Roma, so far having only one shop in town, offers 40 kinds of ice cream. Apart from all of the stuff mentioned above, it carries famous Italian classics such as Stracciatella with crispy chocolate crumbs, Tiramisu with mascarpone cream, Frutti di Bosco with mixed berries, and coffee-flavored Cappuccino. There is also a variety of sorbets made out of cranberries, oranges, pineapples, melon and much more.

Gelateria Roma also has several types of ice cream unknown to the Slavic palate, such as Zuppa Inglese ("English Soup") made with liquor and biscuit. There is nougat ice cream with candied fruits, and even ice cream with oatmeal cookies. And the most unusual ice cream has mastic resin as key ingredient. Children love the neon-blue Azzurro.

The regular price for a 70-gram portion of any gelato is Hr 10. Also, they can make milkshakes from your preferred ice-cream. If you wish to take your dessert with you, in Gelateria Roma they put it in a special cool container for Hr 10, which makes it possible to carry the cold dessert for up to two or three hours, without having to put it in the fridge. What's more, at Gelateria Roma you can order ice cream cakes from any ice cream you prefer and have it layered with biscuit, cookies and fruit.

Despite a similar-sounding name, La Gelateria Italiana is a very different place. It offers about 30 flavors of ice cream. Just recently they added to their assortment some new light fruit sorbets, so now you can choose from wild berries, blueberry, strawberry, green apple, cherry, raspberry, pineapple and other types of sorbets. Besides, Hayatt and Radisson SAS hotels order citrus sorbets from La Gelateria Italiana for their fancy restaurants. Apart from sorbets, the gelato parlor offers traditional ice cream in the following flavors: chocolate, coffee, hazelnut, pistachio, strawberry, vanilla, white chocolate, and – my favorite – Tiramisu. They, too, have unusual flavors of ice cream, such as green tea, combinations of lemon and pine nuts, peach and cream, orange and bitter dark chocolate, milk chocolate and rum. Yum!

The ice cream here is a bit pricier – Hr 13 for a scoop in a waffle cone (100 grams) and Hr 23 – for two scoops. Dessert also come in a special container. They will also make a milkshake from your preferred gelato for the price of Hr 20, and will make you a kilo of ice-cream cake for Hr 130. Also recommended are their cold ice cream-desserts.

The Leonardo chain of ice cream parlors only uses exclusive Italian technologies and recipes. They say Italian experts often visit their local production facility to make sure the local manufacturing meets their standards. Leonardo's sorbets should contain at least 60 or 70 percent of natural fruits and berries. Right now, Leonardo makes about 70 types of ice cream at Hr 8 per scoop. But only about a third of it is offered at their shops – the rest can be made upon request. The order-only menu includes some exotic flavors that are Leonardo's very own specialties: there is ice cream flavored with champagne, liquorices, salmon and even garlic. The local ice cream makers say they don't add anything into their gelato, only fresh dairy, sugar and flavors – no thickeners, no anti-freezing agents, and nothing artificial.

Gelateria Leonardo is also famous for its selection of Semifreddo, Italian semi-frozen desserts, typically ice cream cakes, half-frozen custards, and fruit tarts. The desserts have the texture of frozen mousse. My recommendation is to try the forest berry Semifreddo based on vanilla ice cream with red berry filling, or pineapple Semifreddo with strong chocolate and nut flavor and soft sour pineapple souffle inside. And don't miss their traditional Catalonian dessert called Crema Catalana, made with custardy creme brulle and a caramelized crisp sugar topping.

Once new and cool, Baskin-Robbins's ice cream is not quite as popular as it once was. The most central Baskin-Robbins's kiosk that used to be located at the Globus shopping mall closed down, apparently unable to compete with the Gelateria Italiana, just a few steps away. However, you can still try the famous Baskin-Robbins with its iconic pink spoons at several locations in the city, namely Metrograd, Karavan and Kvadrat shopping centers. Their selection of ice cream flavors has also decreased overtime: there are no more sugar-free sherbets. Unlike the Italians who don't normally mix more than two flavors, Baskin-Robbins mixes everything: chocolate with almonds and fruit candies, orange with raspberries, and so on. For an ultimate Baskin-Robbins experience, try their traditional original flavors, preserved since the first Baskin-Robbins's shop opened in 1945. Those are Chocolate Chip vanilla ice cream loaded with bittersweet chocolate chips, the Mint Chocolate Chip, Pistachio Almond, the Baseball Nut – a vanilla ice cream filled with cashews, and Love Potion 31, with white chocolate and black raspberry swirls, loaded with raspberry-filled chocolate hearts and chocolate chips. A single scoop will cost you Hr 9.

The leaders of Ukrainian ice cream making also claim to use Italian technologies. There are two Ukrainian brands of soft ice cream: Asorti (Assortment) and Lakomka (Sweet Tooth), which are sold in small pavilions in the city's busiest spots. Asorti has dark blue kiosks that traditionally offered two flavors of low fat ice cream, coffee and lemon, which you can buy on their own or mixed (Hr 4,50 for 100 grams). Recently they added two more flavors, vanilla and blueberry, but they are not quite as popular as those traditional yellow-brown cones.

Lakomka makes a number of flavors, including chocolate, lemon, vanilla and strawberry, which they can glaze with chocolate, if you wish. Lakomka's ice cream is both fattier and sweeter than Asorti's coffee-and-lemon dessert. In Lakomka, you can have your ice-cream served in a waffle cone or paper bowl. The second type of container allows you to mix any flavors and choose syrups, nuts or chocolate sauce toppings.

However, you don't even need to seek cafes and restaurants to try a real tasty Ukrainian ice cream there. In the summer, ice lollies, chocolate-glazed ice creams, and cornets are widely available anywhere you go. Ice-cream lovers are recommended to sample Belaya Noch toffee ice-cream, Ptashyne Moloko ("Bird's Milk"), a delicious chocolate-glazed souffle and the Truffle Cornet – a good choice for chocolate fans.

Folklore-loving Japanese finds new home in Ukraine

By YULIYA POPOVA

popova@kpmmedia.ua

I first met Hiroshi in my friend's kitchen sitting at a table lain with Japanese cooking items. I expected an evening of sushi-making in the company of globetrotters known for their ceaseless love of Japan. But when I heard Hiroshi announcing in pure Ukrainian that tempura dishes were on the menu instead, I decided it was time to set my stereotypes aside.

Born in Osaka, often dubbed the second city of Japan, Hiroshi Kataoka, now 38, picked Russian philology and history as his major with 30 other students in the metropolis of 17 million. He worked in a restaurant part-time to save money and go to Moscow. When he made his first trip there in 1997, he recalls that police were bugging him every day and "that it was very scary". Perhaps, they had thought that a Japanese man researching folk stories about the evil eye could add supernatural trouble to the country's political and economic turbulence.

But so bewildered was he with the Slavic traditions that even the fear of Russian militia could not stop him from coming back to Russia for a two-month language course.

He first discovered Ukraine in the Museum of Etymology in St. Petersburg. "They put Ukraine in a separate room. When I saw a painting of a man with a cossack mustache wearing an embroidered shirt in the field, I thought it was very different from a traditional Russian image", he described his first exposure to the country he calls home now.

Having finished his 'evil eye' thesis in Osaka, he headed to Kyiv to become perhaps the only Japanese in the world to study Ukrainian folklore. "Ukraine is one of the last countries left in Europe where people in villages still practice ancient rituals and preserve the authentic culture", he says referring to Christmas, Easter and pagan holidays of harvests, the summer and winter solstices.

He thinks that folk traditions are similar around the world because they all take root in paganism. For example, in western Ukraine, people make 'didukh' or a wheat sheaf that represents a family tree. It is believed to possess their ancestors' spirits during Christmas holidays. According to Hiroshi, a similar custom exists in Japan.

The same goes for a traditional porridge called 'kutya' in Ukrainian. Apparently, his family cooks the same cereal out of wheat, raisins, honey and nuts for Christmas.

He then made a shocking toilet-related revelation about Japan. Apparently, women there clean it scrupulously every day because the object is perceived to be the entrance to another world. "If you fall into the toilet somehow, you are supposed to change your name because it means that you have come in and out of another dimension," explained Hiroshi, sounding like it was a perfectly natural thing to fall into.

While I was struggling with the idea of falling into the loo, my sensei (or teacher in Japanese) also tried to convince me that ancient Ukrainians had a similar belief.

Feeling almost related to Hiroshi after discovering that our cultures were so much alike, I decided to pose a few cliched questions.

KP: Do all Slavic people look identical to you as the Asians do to an average Ukrainian?

HK: At the beginning, they did. But after spending five years here, it is not true anymore.

KP: Is it true that sushi prepared in Ukraine tastes different from the ones in Japan?

HK: When new Japanese restaurants open up in Kyiv, chefs go out of their way. But with time the quality changes. Sushi is not a staple food in Japan. We eat them only on special occasions.

KP: What religion do you belong to?

HK: I am a Buddhist. But in Japan religion is more a philosophy than a cult. For example, on New Year's Day I will go to a Shintoist temple, to get married – at a Catholic church, and to baptize a newborn – at a Buddhist sanctuary.

KP: What difficulties have you had settling in Ukraine?

HK: For a long time, the National Taras Shevchenko University did not want to accept me to study because there is no law that allows foreigners to take up a postgraduate degree in Ukraine. The whole thing turned into a war. The former Minister of Education Stanislav Nikolaenko stood up for me, so they made an exception. But nothing has been done to improve legislation, and it's very sad.

KP: What do you think about

(Alina Rudyk)

Ukrainian women?

HK: They are strong and fragile at the same time. I like how they combine these seemingly irreconcilable features and stay naturally feminine. In Japan, women can't allow themselves to cry. They carry heavy bags and don't expect men to help them, so there is no difference between men and women. Feminism is a tragedy in Japan.

KP: Would you like to stay in Ukraine?

HK: Yes, I would like to live here forever. This country has a convenient lifestyle with an emphasis on culture and free time. In Japan, we work up to 12 hours a day. There I would not be able to take more than a week's holiday at a time.

When we met for the second time, I picked a Ukrainian restaurant where Hiroshi's immaculate language skills could shine. He told me that the Ukrainian Union of Writers commissioned him to write a book about Ukrainian traditions in Japanese.

He also impressed me by offering to take my bag – something the Japanese men do not usually do. And then he found a roll of hryvnas under the table that may have fallen out of the pocket of a previous customer. Instead of keeping it, Hiroshi called a waitress and handed over his discovery. That made me think he is a discovery in his own right for Ukraine.

Ukrainian hospitality at Latino tavern Amigos

By ALEXANDRA MATOSHKO
matoshko@kpmmedia.ua

Before I set out to dine at Amigos with a friend, I knew only a few basic facts about it – it was supposed to be a restaurant with a proper Latin American atmosphere, authentic food prepared by Cuban and Argentinean chefs, and occasional tango lessons. Considering that there are very few places in town serving Spanish and South American food, I was really excited, yet I couldn't help wondering, why I'd never heard of it before?

As we neared the place, I got my answer – tucked away at one of those very quiet and mostly deserted Podil streets, Amigos surely had difficulty becoming famous. And its casually painted signboard situated on the corner of the building didn't look especially tempting either.

The restaurant itself is located in a semi-basement – there are windows, but on the ground floor, and the interior consists of three halls – the bar and two dining halls – smoking and non-smoking respectively. When calling to book a table, I was informed they were having a private party in one of the rooms, and as we took our seats, we already could see and hear it starting. "Amigos" were arriving and some ugly Ukrainian pop was playing in the background. It certainly worked against Latino's atmosphere – and the walls painted with landscapes of a Spanish or South American city, as well as some colorful flags attached to the wall didn't quite improve the impression. I almost found it hard to believe that tango lessons ever take place there, even though I have material proof that they do (see picture). Our waitress – smiling, amiable and very hospitable – helped break the charms of the supposed Latino tavern further by offering us Olivier salad, pickled cucumbers and herring, which weren't on the regular menu, but were prepared for the party. She certainly meant well – her whole countenance said it, but after this my expectations for a Spanish-style meal weren't so high anymore...

Still, I hoped to try something authentic and expressed this to the waitress, which she didn't seem to quite understand, but politely withdrew, leaving us to study the menu. It started with a set of regular Ukrainian cold appetizers and salads with names like "Macho" "Seville" and "Barcelona," but actually being common local mixes of vegetables, with cheese, mushrooms, ham, etc., dressed with mayonnaise. The two pages that followed were billed "Spanish Cuisine" and "Argentinean Cuisine" – much more inspiring. The Argentinean part was mostly about grilled meat, and in the Spanish part I discovered my favorite gazpacho (Hr 25), which immediately raised my spirits. It also contained several kinds of paella, and some Spanish-style garnishes, including grilled sweet corn (Hr 8 per one), which was quickly included in the order.

Along with gazpacho, I decided to choose some meat grilled Argentinean-style, and finally selected "Amigos" pork (Hr 65). My friend preferred "La Conga" salad (Hr 46), and "Milanese" veal (Hr 45). In addition we also took Argentinean pasties "Empanadas Pollo" with chicken (Hr 30).

Our sweet waitress apologized several times saying we'd have to wait 15-20 minutes for the food, as they had a party to cook for. Frankly, having waited for 30 minutes at some fancier places in Kyiv without any party going on and no warnings, we surely couldn't complain. The downside was that we had to wait for our drinks – Cuba Libre for me and white Chilean Frontera (Hr 15 per 100 grams) for my friend – even longer.

While the food was being prepared, we went to take a closer look at the jukebox – the bad music playing was seriously getting on our nerves. After browsing the selection of songs for some time, my friend put on Gipsy Kings – to help create a Latino party illusion.

When we returned to our table, the pasties, the salad and the soup were already there. The drinks still weren't, but when they did, I was amused to see my Cuba Libre served in a strange glass – it was a bit like a Margarita glass, but very round, and hardly suitable for such a drink.

Imperfections aside, about the food... the "Empanadas," shaped like small cheburecks, where made up of thin deep-fried pastry inside filled with a mixture of chicken, green onions, pepper and some special spices – it was not only delicious, but clearly an authentic dish prepared by a pro, and my opinion of Amigos quickly began to improve. The pasties came with two sauces – one of them, the very spicy red one neither of us liked much, but the mild green sauce of oil, garlic and herbs was great.

My gazpacho was perfection (for its price) – a generous portion of thick creamy light red concoction came in a bowl covered with a plate with all the traditional additions to the soup – croutons, cucumbers, pepper and onion were placed. It was a bit too mild even for me, and I spiced it up with some black pepper, but apart from that I enjoyed every spoonful.

My friend, who ordered her "La Conga" salad simply because it contained her favorite egg-plants with garlic, mixed with fresh vegetables and dressed with mayonnaise, was quite satisfied with her choice, though pronounced it a bit too salty. She wasn't quite as happy with "Milanese" veal – a long flat slice of meat fried in bread-crumbs – it was really dry, though perhaps it was missing a suitable garnish or sauce.

I, on the other hand, savored my grilled pork – it was a really big piece of tenderloin, juicy and soft with distinct smoky flavor, and it went well with the remains of the green sauce. Finally, both of us simply loved the grilled corn – it was very sweet, the kind you're not likely to purchase at the regular street market.

As there were no desserts to tempt us on the menu, we decided to check out the specials menu of cold coffee drinks placed separately on the table. We took two different coffee cocktails with creamy toppings and ice-cream – those took about 20 minutes to arrive, but again tasted fine.

Amigos gave us mixed impressions. We received a very warm reception and enjoyed the modestly priced authentic food, yet the place felt like it wasn't sure what it was – a Ukrainian restaurant with some exotic dishes on the menu, or a Latino tavern unable to reach its target audience. After all it's the people who make up the atmosphere, and when more fans of Spanish and Latin American cuisine come in to appreciate the cooking of the two chefs, I'm sure Amigos will prosper.

Bike motocross riders jump, twist and spin for their thrills

Jumps, flips and spins are some of the maneuvers that could be seen at two Kyiv staging areas for BMX (bike motocross) tricksters. Performing over improvised half-pipes and ramps, these enthusiasts can be seen throughout the city more frequently. The BMX scene is new to Kyiv but the lifestyle that comes with it is catching on fast in every large city in Ukraine.

BMX (derived in the 1970s from motorcycle racing over natural terrain) is a competitive, extreme sport for one person and a way to fly for others. It can be described as trickster bike riding at any place where poles, steps, and railings are placed. Riders use specially equipped bicycles that have extra strong parts. The bikes can be found at a select few specialty shops. The good thing is these stores have a wide selection. The variety is geared for extreme riding, whose designs are simple and inexpensive.

This is not to say you won't run into custom made bikes. But they as much as a small car or motor bike and are made for one reason: ultimate hard-riding abuse.

In Kyiv, the BMXers surprisingly delight spectators with their shocking tricks and sudden moves. They jump really high, slide on rails, grind and during flight they are unpredictable. They usually choose parks, squares or any-place good enough for stunts.

Several months ago an open-air skate-park opened near the Lukianivska metro in Kyiv. There, you can find many different people, starting with bike riders and skaters up to scooters. The area around Minska metro is also a popular staging ground for bmxers.
